

Evil in High Places

By Anna Von Reitz

It began circa 1700 when the Dutch East India Trading Company operated by the Kings of Belgium and the Netherlands decided to bilk their stock holding investors and customers and leave their insurers on the hook to pay for it.

At the time the Dutch East India Company owned and operated by far the largest fleet of merchant vessels in the world, utterly dwarfing the corresponding British Trading Companies in terms of tonnage and reach.

A deal was struck between the colluding Monarchs by which the Dutch East India "assets" were allowed to find safe harbor in New York, various ports in South America, the Philippines, India, and elsewhere under the protection of the British Navy.

And so the Dutch scoundrels came to our shores and names like Vanderbilt and Rockefeller and Roosevelt came along with them.

This also led to the circumstance eighty years later in which the victorious Colonists had a vast merchant fleet and no navy to spit on.

That left the Monarchs and the former Colonists in a mutual bind. The Europeans needed the raw materials from America, and the Americans needed the European markets to buy their commodities.

What to do?

There was no choice but to strike a deal with King George III by which he agreed to act as the Trustee for the American Merchant Fleet on the High Seas and Navigable Inland Waters --- and assign the British Navy to protect the American (Dutch) Commercial Fleet.

This was not something either side relished, but if King George hadn't agreed the other European Monarchies would have been at war with him (and things were already bad enough) for depriving them of the income from their commercial fleets and access to American raw materials. As for the Americans, their comparatively tiny population could not possibly consume all the commodities they produced as a means of livelihood in their own domestic markets, which would have meant waste and oversupply and loss of value in the marketplace for the fisheries, mines, farms, and plantations---- riots for the fledgling government and starvation for Americans who had already endured eight years of war.

So there you have it, the "foundational" quid pro quo that drove the setup of our government.

Now that you can understand why it was set up this way, with King George still left in charge of nineteen very fundamental and important duties and control of our federal government in those areas, you can also understand how we wound up with both The United States of America and The United States and two separate populations on our shores--- as The Definitive Treaty of Peace, Paris, 1783 put it--- we had "the free, sovereign, and independent people" living side by side with the British citizen "inhabitants" who were "residing" here on a temporary basis to provide "essential government services" (See Article IV of the actual Constitution --- what the Holy See calls the "Original Equity Contract".)

The British were here to protect commercial shipping, to direct the conduct of war if necessary, were -- as Trustees and under the obligations of trusteeship-- obligated to conduct our foreign trade negotiations for our benefit, and be responsible for all the other "delegated powers" allowed by the actual Constitution creating The United States as a subset of The United States of America.

Quite quickly, the Dutch grasped the importance of The United States of America (unincorporated, of course) and sought supremacy over the English members of that superior (with respect to The United States) government, while those like Alexander Hamilton who distrusted the Dutch and favored the English resisted by enforcing the constitutional agreements to the letter.

Here we are, more than two hundred years later. The British-Dutch, Dutch-British struggle has continued more or less unabated throughout the entire time, and the hapless Americans have been in the middle, confused by it all. Most recently, (1946) the French and the United Nations have gotten in the thick of it and had their paws in our pockets, too.

To say that things have run amok would be a gross understatement.

We are left with a situation which is not political in nature, but rather requires prosecution as crime, if any "Rule of Law" is to survive. We are hampered in that effort in that the members of the American and British Bar Associations entrusted with the orderly prosecution and enforcement of the Public Law are in fact misdirected to commit more crime against us (both personage and barratry) and to enforce private corporate administrative codes and to act as glorified bill collectors of non-existent debts (racketeers and privateers) instead.

Both the British and opposing interests concluded toward the beginning of last century that it was more profitable and convenient for them to feed on us together as colluding parasites, than to fight with each other over the spoils. The result has been an acceleration of the corruption, violence, and insanity which leaves everything 180 degrees out of whack and upside down.

We, the actual Americans, have meanwhile developed our resources and become a Super Power. We have no actual need for any antiquated quid pro quo to enable our goods to get to market, and no reason to embrace any joint sovereignty position at all.

We do so only to enforce the provisions of our actual Equity Contract as it stands and reserve the right to renegotiate it as we please in days to come.

We are often asked why we are not in the vanguard of some political movement, why we do not join a political party, why we are not gathering followers and choosing emblems and hoisting banners.

We reply--- there is no need. We already have our flag(s) for both war and peacetime, and we are hoisting the peacetime flag. The actual American people haven't gone anywhere and we still maintain and have our Body Politic, fully in possession of the land jurisdiction of this country. The United States of America is still very much alive, contrary to the self-interested rumors of our demise.

No, this isn't about politics. It certainly isn't about Americans committing these crimes, because they have all been committed by the Territorial "United States Citizens" and Municipal "citizens of the United States" --- dishonest foreign-controlled servants who have harmed us and then used the wealth and power they obtained from us to harm others --- and in the process made it look like we were the ones to blame.

Essentially, the same thing happened here as happened in England when Queen Victoria betrayed the people and sold them as chattel by first enfranchising them and then offering their labor and interest in their assets in exchange for investor shares in the UNITED KINGDOM----and then used the money she raised to support the Raj and colonial conquest of India. Anyone who doubts it needs only to read the papers of Benjamin D'Israeli with a modern understanding of what "enfranchisement" means in the corporate sense.

The same nasty business has been carried out on our shores and also against the Canadians and Australians, and over time, against everyone else as well. It's a form of Commercial Feudalism based on economic algorithms and Bad Faith dealings at the highest levels of government.

This is about evil in High Places, which impacts us and everyone else on a worldwide basis, and which has gotten utterly out of control.

By all accounts dribbling in, the representatives of the member nations of the United Nations have had a nasty shock. They have realized, finally, that the central banks are not content to be rich unaccountable idol-makers. The so-called Central Banks want it all, including the political power.

In making threats and flaunting their power, the banks have over-played their hand, underestimating the more venal instincts of those who crave both political and financial power, and who have the actual means to exercise both. The politicians may be stupid, they may be lazy, they may have the morals of pigs, but when they finally realize that their power and position has been totally undermined by their marriage to the banks, they will waste no time in securing a divorce.

As for the American states and people, we say--- enough. Our money has always been and still is the actual United States Silver Dollar and our strength is still in honest international trade. Now that everyone knows that the Cesspool in DC is not our responsibility and that we are the Priority Creditors of the both the Territorial and Municipal United States, we are prepared to bring closure to these issues and an end to debt-based economics worldwide.
