

Your Grandfather's Clock

By Anna Von Reitz

Let's pretend that you inherited a beautiful Grandfather's Clock from your Grandfather. It's big and old and heavy and tall and you have to wind it every day by pulling down a heavy iron weight, but it keeps good time and the chimes marking the hour are quiet and melodious.

You grew up with it, you like it, you decide to keep it, but in your house the only place that it easily fits is in back of a stairwell in a hallway that leads to a back door that you seldom use.

So you put the clock out in that seldom-used entry way and over time, you forget to wind it, so it just sits there day after day, month after month, and year after year. It's still there, still usable, but because of its location and your busy life and the difficulty of moving it into the living room (where it would fit, if you took the time and made the effort to move some other stuff around) --- it just collects dust. You almost forget that its there.

That's the situation with your actual government.

The new hustle-bustle world of commerce butted in and grabbed all the attention, and it was so fast and easy. Just buy a battery and you never have to worry about winding the clock. All those private, for-profit "government service" corporations nosed in and offered you all their many, many services, and you bought them all (whether or not you realized that you were buying them).

From then on, a "government" employee was always there ready to buy new batteries and change them for you. You didn't even have to think about clocks anymore, except to read the time. Everything just seemed to run by itself and you didn't have to do anything. You didn't even bother to vote in the employee elections.

[To be fair, some of you were aware enough to realize that you weren't government employees and couldn't justify voting in their elections, so you didn't volunteer. And still others realized their mistake and stopped voting for that reason.]

What a shock to find out that all that "government service" is costing you far, far more than anyone ever told you? What a shock that you never actually even thought about it until now?

No doubt it's an even bigger shock that you have to drag the old Grandfather's Clock out from behind the stairs and start winding it again if you want to know what time it actually is.

I just read the paperwork where Obummer and Joe Biden and the rest of the completely insane former "Administration" issued 25,000 trillion "US Dollars" ---- not to be confused with The United States Dollar --- as "US" Treasury Debt Notes.

God only knows which "United States" and which "United States Treasury" was supposed to pay for all this, but it wasn't our United States and it was not our Treasury issuing these "Notes". That much I can assure you.

They have seriously tried to put this country 25,000 trillion dollars in debt. They tried to hang all that on you and your kids. And all because you forgot to wind your own clock.

Get down on your knees and thank your Creator that everyone else in the world --- everyone except the completely insane U.S. Democratic Party ---understands that this is nuts, and knows that the books have to be wiped clean of Odious Debt, and that all the deliberate confusions about who is who and what is what must end.

Certain criminals who have sought to defraud not only all the Americans, but everyone else for the past 150 years, must be brought to justice. The banks that colluded in all of this fraud, have to be shut down and placed under new management. All the currencies in the world need to be "reset" against the value of an actual American Dollar--- our actual, factual silver dollar.

All you government employees and volunteers and dependents out there? All you welfare recipients and pensioners? Vote Republican. It's your only chance of survival. And I mean that literally.
