

What I Find Hilarious --- in a Sick Way

By Anna Von Reitz

Almost daily I find myself attacked by neophytes who almost invariably use things I have taught, often in my exact words, taken out of context, and hurled in my face as if I don't already know the facts and haven't already gone over that ground.

I suppose this "Reverse Feedback" is some small measure of what I have accomplished, that people are now blurting and sharing information and insight that I provided, as if they or one of their pals was the source of the information in the first place.

It is laughable, really.

And they invariably complain that they don't understand what I am saying or that to them, I appear to be in conflict or "making a circular argument" simply because they still don't know --- for example, that "Confederate States" are "States of States", or fail to recognize which "United States" I am talking about at any given time, or still don't know there is a difference between "the" United States of America and The United States of America.....and between the American Union of States and the "Union" of Northern Confederate States of States during the Civil War.

Let me suggest that everyone goes to my YouTube channel and start reviewing "Granna Bites".

I go back to Grade School, complete with maps and visual aids, and teach you what you should have been taught when you were kids.
