

International Public Notice: Why There Are No State Republics at This Time

By Anna Von Reitz

There are no State Republics at this time --- there are only republican States.

There's a difference. Take note. Also note that the word "republican" as used here has nothing to do with any political party.

We are guaranteed a "republican form of government" -- not a republic form of government.

In Latin there is a difference between "republic" and "republican" and that difference carries on when you translate to English.

A State is an unincorporated business belonging to the people of each state.

A State-of-State is a corporate business belonging to the State referenced above.

A State Republic is an incorporated business belonging to the State-of-State.

There is a reason why, when you look around, you don't see a Confederation of States in operation, and you don't see a Federal Republic, either.

States create Confederate States, Confederate States create State Republics.

Without the States being in Session neither the American Confederate States nor the American State Republics could be reconstructed.

Well-meaning patriots have mistaken republican States for the State Republics which were members of the original Federal Republic that functioned from 1787 to 1861.

Those State Republics were incorporated entities owned and operated by the original Confederation of States that operated from 1781 to 1861.

Both the Confederation operating as the States of America and the Federal Republic operating as the States of America, Inc., were rendered inoperable when the Southern delegates walked out and left both the Confederation and the Federal Republic without a quorum.

The members of these long-lost organizations were American States-of-States and American State Republics respectively.

The republican States have been called into Session and are now in General Session throughout The United States.

The republican States have not yet addressed the need to form their own new State-of-State business organizations, and so, the new American State-of-State business organizations have not been present to create new State Republics, either.

That's why there are no State Republics at this time.

Many might assume that the State-of-State that they are familiar with is their State-of-State, but this, too, is not the case, either.

Since the Civil War Era, the States-of-States that have been functioning here are British Territorial look-alike and sound-alike knock offs that have usurped against and been substituted for our American States-of-States and their State Republics on an "emergency basis".

So, we have a lot of work to do to restore our lawful and intended government to full form and function. There are many who would like to mistake and commandeer and misrepresent this process, but we are determined that neither we nor the rest of the world will be fooled again by criminals in nice suits, nor be misled by well-intentioned but ignorant patriots.

This is a step-by-step restoration process with known requirements and just as a house may not appear without its foundations, neither can a new State Republic nor a mutually-held Federal Republic appear out of thin air.
