Thoughts About Undeclared Federal Agents

By Anna Von Reitz

Federal Agents have a moral and legal responsibility to disclose themselves for what they are when directly questioned. It arises from law forbidding entrapment, trespass, and other crimes.

Sometimes called a Bevins Declaration, you can put these Moles between a rock and a hard place simply by making a statement at the beginning of your actual Assembly meetings and calls to the effect:

"Anyone here still claiming any form of US Citizenship or employment with any Federal Agency is now -- for the next segment of the call (meeting, etc.,) invited to either declare your presence and business here, or directed to leave the Assembly at this time."

This allows the Assembly to have open calls and meetings where more people can be educated and assisted, but then also to close meetings and teleconferences to Federal Agents.

If Federal Agents fail to declare themselves and stay after they have been invited to leave, they have broken the law and anything they obtain as a result of acting in a clandestine fashion is tainted by fraud and inadmissible in court.

This can also help ferret out people in leadership positions who shouldn't be there.

The man actually responsible for the incarceration of the Colorado Nine was a Federal Insurance Agent named Michael R. Hamilton. At least, that is the name he used to do his dirty work.

He basically encouraged them to believe things that aren't true but which are incorrect "common knowledge".

So they believed that they were "US Citizens".

They believed that they were owed all the constitutional guarantees----while claiming to be US Citizens.

They believed that the "STATE OF COLORADO COURT" was their court and had to answer to their Grand Jury.

And none of those things are true. When I told them they were wrong and that none of these things were true, Michael R. Hamilton puffed out his chest and basically said, "Ignore her! She's just a woman!"

Michael R. Hamilton stood in the background and encouraged them to assume things they had assumed all their lives---- wrong things, as it happens---- and egged them on.

When it came time for the arrests, Michael R. Hamilton was nowhere to be found.

I wonder how much grief and loss could have been spared, if the organizers of the Colorado Assembly had simply made that little Bevins Declaration part of their ritual?

How much could have been spared if the men involved had been less "sure of what they didn't know"?

See this article and over 1600 others on Anna's website here: www.annavonreitz.com To support this work look for the PayPal button on this website.