

The NIH and CDC Are Not Public Institutions

By Anna Von Reitz

Once and for all, people, wise up and wake up.

The NIH and CDC are not public institutions. They are "federal" in the same sense as Federal Express or the Federal Reserve. They are private incorporated organizations in the business of making, evaluating, and selling vaccines. They also perform under some "government" contracts to do research, collect and analyze statistical data, etc., so that they are subcontractors of our Subcontractors of our Subcontractors.

Like the FBI and DHS and FEMA and BATF and IRS, they are three layers down in the layers of unauthorized secondary "federal" subcontractors and they have less than no authority related to you.

It's like having an employee at Wendy's Hamburgers come out on the street and demand that you wear a mask because they've got the flu. And if you obey that order, then they have reasonable grounds to assume that you owed them that obedience, don't they?

But as the "government" involved in contracting for services from the CDC and NIH is simply another, larger, foreign, for-profit commercial corporation engaged in the business of providing governmental services, and as there are no provisions allowing any of these bounders to infringe upon our rights and prerogatives in the name of public health -- which is not the same as or even part of "public welfare" -- they all need to be stood down by the actual people of this country.

You are all playing with phantoms--- THINGS like boogey men that don't actually exist, except on paper--- a charter granted to them via the use and too often, the abuse of, your own delegated powers.

You are letting yourselves be bossed around by Subcontractors of Subcontractors of Subcontractors, and instead of telling your direct Subcontractors where to get off, you are scuttling around obeying improper demands posed by the employees of Employees of your Employees.

Got that?

The NIH and CDC have no authority related to you, and to the extent that some other government subcontractors believe whatever the NIH or CDC may say, their beliefs and their actions are completely immaterial.

Government subcontractors don't own this country, and they are being informed of this fact daily by Americans who know who they are.
