

There's Pikers, and Then.... There's Bob Hurt

By Anna Von Reitz

Imagine this situation:

You have spent decades of your life studying public documents that are available to everyone to read. You look around and realize that nobody knows what those documents actually say -- so you bring forward the facts to help educate people who are suffering and "being destroyed" as Amos says, for lack of knowledge.

And certain people start calling you a "liar" and a "fake" and God-only-knows-what-else, even though they haven't bothered to read it all themselves. They just "know" what they think they know. And then they demand that you "prove it" to them because they are too lazy to read the documents and prove it to themselves.

Let's recap --- they haven't read the documents. You have. They won't believe you when you tell them what the documents say. Then they still refuse to read the documents for themselves and demand that you "prove" to them what the documents say....

Hello?

That reminds me of the time my Best Friend Forever said she'd offer me five bucks to go pee for her because she was afraid to walk out to the latrine at summer camp in the middle of the night.

There are some things that other people can't do "for" you. Proving what a document that you refuse to read for yourself says --- is one of those.

I wish there were some way that I could attach a USB cable from my ear to your ears and just download everything I know. The world would quickly become a much safer and saner and more law-abiding place.

Everyone would know how the governments are supposed to be structured and how they are supposed to be funded and would know where the problems lie --- and so, would correct the Mess without any big debate.

But until people stop reacting like little babies and going "Waah! Wahh! That can't be so! You must be lying to me! Waah! Wahh! Prove it to me! Waaaah!" -- and start reading and thinking as adults who are responsible for reading and researching and knowing the facts for themselves -- there is no USB cable.

You have to either believe me and take my word for what it says, or you have to read it yourself and determine what it says. Those are the two options that Nature gave us. All those that want "proof" need to man up and prove it to themselves, especially as I and others have already done the heavy lifting and told everyone where to look.
